To study the differences in sexual and psychosocial risk factors related to musculoskeletal pain in girls and adolescents. Of 1017 girls aged 16 to 18 years, 28 were found to have low back pain (LBP) after a physical examination and self-report of low back pain. Comparisons were made between this sample and a sample of 355 healthy girls of the same age and ethnicity. Participants completed a written questionnaire including screening questions from the Structured Interview for Social Phobia and Screening Test for the Differential Etiology of Disorders of Sex Development. Subjects also completed the Symptom Checklist-90 and the Spinal Pain Questionnaire. Mothers completed the Child Behavior Checklist and the Behavior Rating Inventory of Executive Function. Girls with LBP were less likely to be physically active (odds ratio = 0.26; 95% confidence interval [95% CI] = 0.15, 0.45) and more likely to report anxiety (odds ratio = 2.56; 95% CI = 1.30, 5.00). On the Symptom Checklist, girls with LBP reported more somatic complaints (P d4474df7b8
