And just as before, the French appear to be the favorites, although the rest of the peloton will have their hands on their collective wallets as they await the news from Paris on Monday. Unsurprisingly, Bradley Wiggins – twice the winner of this stage – and Team Sky lead the way, having done enough to claim second and third, with Movistar, Giant-Alpecin and RadioShack-Nissan also topping the poll. What is new is that for the first time, one of the teams – Lotto – has failed to place in the top 10. However, their ambition and passion for the Tour de France are likely to be felt more by their sponsor – the official bank, ING – than the other riders. Tour de France - Media day 2013 Team Sky has retained their place on top of the teams table, but although Wiggins has been the most consistent rider throughout the race, so far, his ambition has been matched by the considerable ability of the Lotto squad. “We do not know the rules, but if a team finishes first in their own country and second in the world, that is something,” said Jose Azevedo. “We’ve been to second in the world, but we did not think it was a realistic target.” Azevedo’s team-mate Tim Wellens said: “For the first time it is good to see we can defend our spot. It’s a good way to show where we are. We have to show we’re still here and we can defend our position.” In the second place team – and probably the most significant addition to the race as a result – is Movistar. They managed to get in the top 10 despite missing out on the top 10 in the first poll. But such is the strength of their squad – which has made a significant commitment to the race – they were boosted to second by a lack of response from the other invitees to the second poll. “Movistar did quite well,” said Azevedo. “It was good to see.
