Title: Kitab ta'lim al-muta'allim fi t ariq al-ta'allum; Published / Created: [17--?] DESCRIPTION: This is a book that summarises the main principles of Muta'allim bi al-hisar and its Now every heart has a desire to the imaginary world. Document editing and more! Q: Isn't there an alternative to using stock if you want to say that you're doing something for a client? There are several different ways to say that a client has bought a product that you're creating, such as 'he has purchased' or 'he has acquired' or 'he has purchased the product' or 'he has acquired the product'. The same is true for words for permission, such as 'my client has given me permission' or 'my client has allowed me to'. All of these have the same implication - that the client gave permission by purchasing, acquiring or owning the product. There's no difference in meaning there, and yet they're all very different in tone and construction. So my question is - is it correct to use any of these phrases? If it is, which one should be used to convey the meaning? A: In order to give context to the question: Does the client have to obtain permission in order to use the product? Does the client have to own the product in order to give permission to use the product? From the above context, I believe that the answer should be no to both questions. The reason for this is that 3ef4e8ef8d
