The present invention is related to a method of forming a microstructure of dielectric material and a composite micro-component comprising such microstructure. The micro-component may be a capacitor, a resistor, a beam-type electret condenser, a coil, a transmission line, a coaxial cable, a coaxial line, a radiation filter, a micro-mirror, a micro-lens or a waveguide. Traditionally, aluminum has been the most commonly used material for microstructure. However, in recent years, attempts have been made to use other materials that would be more suitable for electronic applications. Among these are materials having low dielectric constant such as certain glass and ceramics. The reason for this is that such materials are typically processed in a very similar way as silicon wafers. For example, glass is typically formed by a chemical process or by a mechanical process. Both processes involve either the introduction of an electric field to the glass material or the application of a mechanical stress to the glass to produce strain therein. This often results in the formation of micro-void defects in the glass. Glass may be considered a defective semiconductor, in the sense that it contains a certain density of defects, defects that may be classified as vacancy
