Occurrence of obstetric neural tube defects and encephaloceles in Turkey. To investigate the incidence and the frequency distribution of the major neural tube defects (NTDs) in Turkey. The study population comprised the patients who were admitted to three major hospitals for the management of the NTDs between January 1, 2000 and December 31, 2001. Maternal age and the frequency of NTDs in different types were analyzed. During the 3-year study period, 1703 cases were admitted to the study hospitals for the management of NTDs. The frequency of each NTD was calculated for the study population as a whole and for each of the three hospitals. The mean maternal age was 28.1 years (range: 17-49). The frequency of anencephaly was 7.5 per 10,000 total births, with no statistically significant difference in the frequency of the fetuses among the three hospitals (P = 0.227). The frequency of spina bifida was 11.0 per 10,000 total births. The frequency of encephaloceles was 4.8 per 10,000 total births. The frequency of anencephaly was 4.4 per 10,000 total births among babies born to mothers with a previous history of NTDs. Among the patients with a history of NTDs, 43% of the cases were known before the conception of the next pregnancy. The frequency of spina bifida was found to be 20.3 per 10,000 total births with no statistically significant difference among the three hospitals (P = 0.259). The frequency of anencephaly was found to be 7.5 per 10,000 total births (P = 0.183). The frequency of encephaloceles was 4.0 per 10,000 total births (P = 0.897). Anencephaly is the major neural tube defect (NTD) occurring in Turkish women during pregnancy. The frequency of spina bifida is increasing in Turkey. 1002/ahas.002103 9-1460-180 "Phantoms of Memory": Film Performance and the Architecture of the Cinematic Body The purpose of this paper is two-fold. Firstly I wish to delineate a very precise understanding of what I mean by the term "filmic enactment", and secondly I wish to examine the pervasive influence of filmic images on architects' imagination by making a literal case of the French architect Louis-Emile Bisset's elaborate cinema-design model: "The Orto-Cinema" (1925/1926). My starting point is the rereading of a 19th century French novel, the literary, scientific and, of course, here biographical-dramatic reference, being to Alexandre Dumas' novel The Count of Monte Cristo. Although Dumas' novel is notorious for its rigidly limited view of the sound recording era and its absent reference to cinema, I argue here that it conveys a concern with the construction of the cinematic body that finds, as a starting point, the collapse of the borders between natural perception and impressionistic/expressive projection, and the construction of new scales of experience that, in my view, have a great deal to offer a much-neglected field of aesthetic experimentation in the late 19th and early 20th century. Tepper-Cusack, Holly (2007). Piety and Phantoms: Remembering the Early Soviet Russian Cinemas (1896-1914) PhD thesis, The University of Melbourne. This is a 30 page essay that explores representations of the past in the USSR, particularly from the early 20th century, in the form of films, museums and architecture. The study explores the idea that there were four cinemas in the early 20th century (for the Russians): the white colour cinemas, the small-scale cinemas, the large-scale cinemas and the cultural-political cinemas. The essay is based on extensive reading, archival research and travel to Soviet Russia.LG has been on a roll recently after launching one of the most talked-about phones of 2017, the G7 ThinQ. The new handset comes with innovations such as a Snapdragon 845, Google Lens, and a notch that is one of the smallest so far. Although the handset got positive response from the global community, we still have our reservations. Best budget smartphones of 2018 ADVERTISEMENT
