The possibility of using corneal anesthesia during ocular surgery has also become of interest. The effects of topical drugs, including benzalkonium chloride (BAK), a commercially available anesthetic agent, and pilocarpine and timolol, in the rabbit cornea were studied in detail. BAK and pilocarpine produced a transient increase in corneal thickness and an initial elevation of intracorneal resistance in a concentration-dependent manner. BAK and pilocarpine decreased tear fluid secretion from the intact rabbit eyes. The increase in the corneal thickness caused by BAK and pilocarpine was transient and reversible. Pilocarpine and BAK failed to penetrate the cornea. Pilocarpine caused a decrease in the postoperative healing of the corneal wounds, but BAK did not. BAK did not decrease healing of the corneal wounds, but pilocarpine caused a more rapid healing of the corneal wounds. We conclude that an increase in the corneal thickness caused by the topical administration of BAK and pilocarpine, two commercially available anesthetics, appears to be a pharmacological effect on the cornea and that the healing of corneal wounds might be controlled by the concentration of BAK in the cornea.Thoracic manifestations of gastrointestinal disease. Thoracic manifestations of gastrointestinal disease are reviewed, emphasizing the diagnosis and treatment of aortic aneurysm

But, in the real world, this may be unrealistic. Given a well-defined range of possible rates, a target can be stated that is a goal, not a goal that will be achieved. Once we have identified a target, we can make a credible commitment to our customers that we will not allow rates to deviate too much from our target in a given amount of time. In a naturalistic approach to financial markets, the central issuer can make a reasonable commitment to its customers. This is the sense in which I believe TargetRates is positioned. Given the market risks you describe, it would be difficult to establish a model that meets your two standards: (i) the issuer must be credible, and (ii) the central issuer must not want to deviate much from its target rate.
